Come one, come all. Step right up. Welcome to the clown show. The big top is open, the music is going, and the act is always about to start. You figure that out the second you are standing under the lights. They never bring the lights down. The crowd never goes home. They sit out there in the dark just past where you can see, chewing, waiting for you to slip on something so they can point and howl. That is the whole gig. That is what it is to be a queer girl who got, through talent and the bad luck of running her mouth somewhere with a memory, big enough to be worth watching. From inside it feels like paranoia, and the paranoia is correct. You wake up and before you are fully awake you are already checking your phone with one eye, already doing the scan. Nothing yet. You get through your morning and something small happens, a post, a reply, a girl with a bone to pick, and you feel it in your chest before you read the whole sentence. A disagreement with the wrong girl is a thread. The thread is a pile-on by lunch. The pile-on sucks in forty people who have never said a word to you and do not care what the fight was about. They just want in on the dogpile because dogpiling feels good. By the time it is moving nobody remembers what set it off. You are not a girl who had a disagreement anymore. You are the clown. You are the act. And the act feeds itself while you sit there watching it. Nothing is ever over. Every word you ever said in public is still sitting there in the dark, ready to get dug up and waved around the second somebody decides it is time. That fight you thought you patched up two years ago? Saved. The dumb thing you said when you were exhausted and took back the next morning is still on file, and the take-back is not, because nobody screenshotted that part. New fight starts, the whole drawer opens. Look what she did before. See, she was always like this. You read your own name in those threads and something in your stomach drops, every time, because you recognize the shape of it. You have seen it before. You know where it goes. So you get careful in a way that grinds you down.

You read every sentence before you post it and you are reading it the way they would read it, looking for the angle, looking for the lift. You do the math on whether snapping back is worth the circus it might kick off. You are running that calculation constantly, underneath every conversation, and after a while you cannot remember what it felt like to just say something. The room this happens in is small and incestuous, everybody dating everybody, everybody one ex removed from everybody, so the grudges are preloaded before the fight starts. Pull up any pile-on and count how many of them slid into your DMs once and got nothing back. The horny-to-righteous pipeline is real and it is short. That layer is real and it is also a distraction from the simpler thing: a takedown pays. Everybody you can see in a room like this is holding something. Call it juice. Standing, eyeballs, the thing where being seen next to you makes other people feel like somebody. I have written this before about the girl who gets bled dry in every group, the one whose work and whose name get drained off by the people closest to her while everybody calls the draining love. Same robbery, bigger room. The takedown is just where they do it out in the open. A girl who lives a little more. performs. Works for tends towards a real audience ends up holding juice the room never handed her. She got it outside, from readers who found the work and stuck around because it was good. Now she is walking around with more standing than her rank allows, and to the room that is theft. It is just hanging on her, hanging on a body the room already thinks of as a thing to use, and the takedown is how they get it off her and split it up. When you pile on a girl who got too big, you are robbing her and pocketing it. The callout is the payday. You become the brave one who said it, the one with the morals, and the room pays you in the trust and attention that used to be hers. Her bad day is everybody's payday. Everyone walks off a little fatter than they came, and the bigger she was, the more there is to grab. Which is why they always eat the ones they loved last week. They do not come for nobodies. There is nothing on a nobody.

They come for the ones who built up something worth stealing, and the love that came first was the setup. The love and the killing are the same job in two acts, and how hard they cheered for you tells you how hard they are already planning to drop you. Because under all of it, it is about one thing. You got too big. You got too big for them to keep telling everyone what you mean, and the circus is how they shrink you back down. Trans famous. Cute little phrase. It is a leash. You are known all over their networks and passed around on their feeds and somehow it never once gets you out of the tent. Big enough to be useful to them. Never big enough to get away from them. Trans women catch the worst of this because we have always been the main act. People have been arranging us to be looked at forever, doctors and lawyers and reporters and some nonprofit with a grant, every one of them sitting us in the same chair, the one where you get stared at and explained and never get to do the explaining. The queer room did not build that chair. It just found it sitting there and pulled its whole relationship to us up to it. The trans girl who stays a good clown, who does her transness funny and quotable and easy to repost, gets loved. She is what they want. Something to feel things at. A life that makes content. The trans girl who quits clowning and starts thinking, who builds a real argument and then turns it on the room, ruins the show. There is no slot for a smart girl they did not crown themselves. The clapping turns into something else fast. Watch the relabeling once it starts. She is arrogant. She is cold. She thinks she is better than us. She has a god complex. She platforms freaks. She is mean to her own mutuals. The charges do not have to agree with each other. They just have to get passed around. Every single one is the same thing in different words, the thing they cannot say, which is she stopped asking us for permission and we hate it. There is a trans woman I want to talk about. I am not naming her and I am keeping it vague because the details never mattered. The pattern is the whole thing. First thing they did was swarm her.

A pack of them, all with some little stake in community politics, decided in the same hour that she had done something wrong, and the machine did its machine thing. The charge went around. People who had never read one word of hers were sharing posts about how she failed. It picked up speed on its own. She was supposed to get small. She was supposed to grovel, post the apology, prove their say-so beat hers. She did not get small. She kept writing. a grave crime. So they came back, and this is the funny one. They started saying a robot wrote it. Sit with what you have to be to say that. You look at years of one girl thinking straight, a vocabulary nobody else uses the way she does, essays that build on each other, sentences with her exact nasty rhythm, and your first guess is AI. You reach for the robot before you reach for the obvious answer, which is that she is just better than you, because she has been grinding at this for years while you were workshopping your callout. That accusation shows what the room cannot hold in its hands. Here is a trans woman writing at that level while she is visibly falling apart. Harassed daily. No institution behind her, no money in it. A sad trans girl still needing things is legible, a sad trans girl still needing things is manageable. A girl going through all that and still cranking out work this sharp breaks the costume they stuffed her in. Since everyone can see the suffering, they decide the work is the fake part. She did not write it. A robot wrote it and she is just the face stuck on the front. Which drops her right back in the only seat they ever wanted her in, a thing, a body where smart stuff appears without her having put it there. The one part of her that actually got out of the cage, her mind, they reach in and switch off. I got advice, from myself, at an hour I will not say, in a state I will let you imagine, that putting a long essay out all at once is the exact thing that gets you called a robot. A real human, the theory goes, drips it out slow, in little pieces, so everyone can watch how hard she worked. The advice was to sit on this one. Space it out over a month. Maybe leave a few typos in for flavor so I read as human.

I did not take the advice. If the robot thing starts back up, I would love for whoever says it to go generate this essay themselves and show me what comes out. I am not using AI. The thing you keep reading as a machine, the speed, the way ten thousand words show up overnight already built to hold weight, is a stimulant. I am an addict. The output you cannot wrap your head around has a chemical reason behind it and that reason is mine. I wrote this article furious because people I supposedly trusted had decided to boost a lie against me fully knowing this context. I won't beat around the bush here Auto_Anon knew this information. So sit in what you actually did. You looked at a Black trans woman making more than you figured a person could make and you decided she was faking. And it wasn't just them it was everyone. The fake charge would not stick so you went digging and some of you found it and you said it in public to a crowd like a punchline, like the thing that finally explained everything. Did that feel good. Did outing a Black trans woman as a drug addict feel good. Was that the care. Because from where I am standing it was the oldest cheap trick in the tent, drag the sick girl out to the middle of the ring so everybody can finally see what was wrong with her. I had to put my own addiction in an essay to take a weapon out of your hands. I want you to sit with the specific ugliness of that. You made me do that. That is what you are. This is reactionary. I mean it the way it actually means something, a group that holds itself together by picking an enemy inside the group and turning everybody's private misery into one big righteous beating, and the whole time it feels like solidarity and safety. You do not need a government for it. You need a crowd that wants to feel clean and a body to wipe themselves off on. The words to call the wiping virtue, they already have a whole dictionary of those. Reich called what runs it the emotional plague. The locked-up hate the one who looks like she got loose, and the hatred is savage in the specific way that only proof-of-concept threatens people. Her being free is evidence the clamping was a choice.

Every attack aimed at the girl who built something real is one frightened person converting her freedom into a grievance, grabbing whatever charge is on the ground to make it legal, because the actual charge, she is free and I am not, never gets to be said out loud. You cannot see it from inside because from inside it never feels like fascism. It feels like finally belonging somewhere, finally on the right side, finally allowed to be as angry as you have always been at a target everybody agrees has it coming. The high of the pile-on is the high of going liquid inside a crowd that already decided it is good. The people doing it are scared and mostly powerless and they found the one kind of power they can actually access, which is wrecking a girl together and calling it accountability. The machine never plans for what comes next, because it has no brain, only momentum. You cannot do this to a person for months and expect her to come out sweet. Every cycle teaches her the same thing. Nothing she does ends it. She learns the punishment has nothing to do with what she did and everything to do with what she is, and once she has learned that the reason to be careful evaporates. Why mind your manners for people who reached the verdict before you opened your mouth. So she gets hard. She gets sharp and then meaner. She quits handing out the benefit of the doubt nobody once gave her. She writes things, like this one, that name the machine and refuse to pretend the people running it mean well. And the room watches her go hard and says, see? Told you. Look how nasty she is. Like they had nothing to do with it. Like they did not spend months building the exact girl they are now pointing at to feel justified. Treat a woman like the villain long enough that there is nothing left for her to be, then hold up the villain as proof you were right the whole time. The punishment builds the thing it claimed to be punishing. The trans woman they relabeled dangerous, who ate the dehumanization and watched every friendship she thought was solid rot from underneath her, who stopped trusting her own phone, who learned to read every compliment for the exit strategy buried inside it, does eventually become something you can point at and call dangerous. Bitter. Openly finished with the people who did this.

And the room reads her getting there as vindication instead of as the thing they constructed with their own hands. We weld the cage shut, we run current through the bars for months, and then we act genuinely shocked when she finally bites. And it is never a fair accounting, that is the last knife in it. After months of everybody kicking her she snaps once, burns one bridge she should have left standing, and that one snap goes in the file like it outweighs everything that built to it. The months of provocation are gone. The drawer does not save those the same way. Her reaction becomes the new origin story, the thing the next pile-on will cite, and the people who spent months earning it get to stand there dabbing their eyes playing the wounded party. What the clown show needs is for the clown to stay readable. Her worth is that you can look at her and feel the thing the show already arranged for you to feel. Step out of the frame and she stops being useful, and useless is the same word as problem. The trans girl who built something real stepped out of it. To deal with her now they would have to actually deal with her, read the work, let it be right, and a crowd being a crowd cannot do that without handing back the juice it just finished stealing off her. So it will not. The harassment does not stop once she is small enough, because small was never really the goal. It stops when she stops. And she does not stop, because a girl who built her own work and her own readers does not go quiet because a room she already half-walked-out-of told her to. The pile-on keeps swinging for the same reason any dumb reflex keeps swinging. Its one idea is to get the clown back in the tent. She is not in the tent. The tent is still up. That is the whole thing said plain. She left. She built something that does not need one single person's permission to exist or to keep going. She is still trans, still a woman, still walking through things that would put most people on the floor, still writing. She just stopped asking anyone to bless it. The show cannot live through that. It needs the clown inside, looking out through the flap at the crowd looking in.

The second she turns around and starts writing down what she sees, the whole thing is in trouble, because what she sees is a crowd that paid to watch a clown slowly working out that the clown has been watching them this whole time, taking notes. I should not have had to write this. You made me. Enjoy the show. Now give me money so I can at least get paid for the pain of having to do this <https://ko-fi.com/bundleofstyxx>
